I should like to thank my son Bruce, for suggesting that I put pen to paper to record a little of my life, as a way to fill some of the void left when I had to hang up my golf sticks. I should also like to thank my surviving sisters Patty and Jay, and my brother Collie for taking the time to read the draft chapters relevant to our joint history, and for putting me right where the detail of a matter might have faded in my mind, or been coloured by the passing of the years.

In the same vein, I should like to express my appreciation to Jill Cole, a researcher for the Blayney Shire Local and Family History Group, who checked the accuracy of my memory regarding Mandurama, clarified many points, and added to my store of knowledge. I also greatly appreciated the assistance of the Australian National Library in providing copies of photos from the Lumme Collection, and allowing me to use them. My gratitude, too, to Jean-Mary Fagan, Tony Fagan's widow, for her keenness to help in any way she could in this project.

Although every minute of my time in the Middle East is indelibly imprinted on my mind, I find myself a little hazy on things like troop and weapon numbers, and I am indebted to the authors of the fine books represented in the bibliography, and that I have read, amongst many others, over the years, for some of those particulars.

As detailed in the preface, I have not always presented my thoughts and writings during this project in a way conducive to transcription, and so I give special thanks to Bruce and to Audette, for turning my 700 pages of sometimes shaky hand-written script into the type-written word. I also thank my son-in-law, Jarlath, for reading the chapters as they unfolded and offering encouragement and positive feedback. To my younger son, Pete, my thanks for proof-reading each draft of the manuscript; to Julie Shanahan my appreciation for her thoughtful and helpful comments; and to Ray Allen TP, creative guru and family friend, my thanks for his invaluable advice. To my daughter, Margie, I wish to express my great appreciation for her deft editor's pen.

I am grateful to Alan Jones for his myriad kindnesses, and for his agreeing so readily to write the foreword to this book.

Thanks, too, to James Packer for reading the anecdotes about his father, without objection to their publication; and hopefully with an understanding that they are recorded with some affection.

And finally my special thanks to those who have kept me alive over the last few years, enabling me to complete the book: Bruce, my full-time, endlessly patient carer; the rest of my family, whose love and attention continue to make my life worth living; those in the health industry who provide ongoing and warm-hearted rehabilitative care; and especially to my doctors Greg Hunter and Ian Linton, who have not only somehow kept this rusting body functioning, but through their affectionate care of an old man, have helped keep the spirit within the body alive, and still joyful at the smallest of pleasures.
